The ceramic industry has been working for many years to develop and refine manufacturing processes to enhance and expand the demand of ceramic products. A major objective in the design of ceramic articles is the cost effective manufacture of articles. This has been accomplished through the use of a wide variety of processes which incorporate the capabilities of mass production of ceramic articles using existing equipment. The development of new processes and equipment is being continually sought in order to reduce manufacturing costs. It has been found that the cost of the starting raw materials of ceramics, i.e. clay and silica, comprises a major portion of the cost of producing the ceramic article. Moreover, the processing of clay, which is the main material used to form a ceramic article, has traditionally required the consumption of a great amount of energy. This is true even though the energy required for heating the clay to a controlled temperature is typically less than the energy required for burning kilns in steel and other foundries for the production of ceramics. Thus, although the input cost is relatively small when compared to the total ceramic production, there remains a great opportunity for cost reduction and conservation through the use of thermally efficient processes. Ceramics are produced by first pulverizing and then firing the clay or other raw material to produce a ceramic mass. Generally, the pulverizing process comprises a 3-stage process. These stages are (1) breaking or crushing the raw material with a ball mill; (2) grinding the raw
